Vitreoretinal surgery in paediatric eyes: current concepts and future trends. This review highlights our current concepts in paediatric vitreoretinal surgery and the future trends expected in this field. Paediatric vitreoretinal surgery has significantly progressed over the past decade. Although multiple vitreoretinal pathologies can occur, the major clinical indications in paediatric eyes are branch or total retinal detachments. Recurrent retinal detachment occurring following initial surgery usually occurs in patients with incomplete retina and vitreoretinal adhesions. Retinotomy to establish a retinotomy pocket into which a gas-in-liquid or fibrin glue is injected appears to be the safest and most effective surgical approach to the problem. The clinical outcomes appear to be at least as good as those in adults. In patients with retinectomy alone, the use of anti-VEGF antibodies in combination with vitreoretinal surgery may significantly improve surgical outcomes in post-traumatic retinal detachment in paediatric eyes. The development of paediatric specific instruments, improved understanding of the paediatric vitreoretinal anatomy, better surgical techniques and better knowledge of paediatric physiology and pharmacokinetics are all expected to enhance the success of paediatric vitreoretinal surgery.
